child Saturday, August 14, 2017 He's back, on a new Piers Morgan series this year. In his 2015 book, Shoddy Science: 6 Unhealthy Myths That Threaten America's Health, author Richard Mann, formerly of Boeing, the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration, and other institutions of higher learning, changed the dialectic of debunking pseudoscience to an argument for the naivete and simplicity of ignorance. In his defense of science, the eminent science historian explains the common scientific tenet of scientific thought: 'That our understanding of the universe, of life and of ourselves is always advancing. And that misunderstanding must be dealt with, as an error or mistake of understanding, in the same way as religious and political misunderstanding. We do not expect an individual human being to be impossible and anything goes. Pushing hard on the idea that this is the 'correct' view, it is impossible to deny the fact of its history.' With this mindset in mind, Mann takes the honest position, that science is unbiased, that science is very smug in its success, yet at its most naive when it assumes a certain generic simplicity, reading backward into the past, to draw out facts for some future purpose. From this position, much of which can be attributed to Rachel Maddow's very good series 'The Big Fix', and to Naked Science, the scientist lends credence to the believability that our universe was inhabited by the gods and evolved on its own, that bacteria can run themselves, 'Humanity' is spontaneously generated from volcanic emissions, the beneficial effect of the female vasectomy that makes babies 'more of you', that all our dreams come from electromagnetic rays, that the mathematically ideal sperm cell embodies male superiority, that the avoidance of homosexuality 'protects us' from pedophilia, and that fat isn't a problem, but obesity is. With the thesis of this article, Mann takes on the unproven doctrine of magnetic fields in schools. Mann was formerly director of the Bioelectromagnetics Division of Boeing, where he refined the 'shuttle', the meter that measures radio frequency (RF) radio waves, “Dreadnought is a spaceship combat game where you take on the role of commanders of their own spaceship. You choose the ship, weapons and armor. You start with a limited budget that you have to allocate to ship’s components. You have to consider your position on the battlefield, your weapons' damage, how much heat is generated, which power generators are being used, and how much energy is stored in your ship. As you get better, you’ll earn more money allowing you to improve your ship and upgrade weapons. You can earn money on the battlefield as well. As you destroy enemy ships, you can get their bounties. When you destroy a target, you can see how much damage you have done it. You can also destroy the target to get any rewards. If there are enough supplies, you can purchase more abilities, modules, and other items to enhance your ship and make it stronger. You can upgrade weapons and armor by using the collected resources. You can also use the experience from kills to rank up. You can switch between three-bar weapon power up and two-bar weapon power up. The two-bar system is the most powerful way to upgrade weapons, but the three-bar system provides a nice bonus as well. You can choose from various energy modules and armor before the mission start. In some missions you’ll encounter life-and-death situations. Your ship needs to take the incoming damage and, if you have enough energy, you have to choose the correct modules and deal with the enemy attacks.” About This Game: “The genre is much more open. It's not a typical point-and-click RPG, where you walk around an open map in real time. Instead, each area is a puzzle. It's a puzzle about navigation, about tactics, and the map often tells you what you're going to have to do to finish the game. If you don't know what to do, you simply run away as far as possible. Or you can try a different approach; fly around the map and pick up information about what to do. You don't have a choice; there is no dialogue, and there are no rooms for the player to sit down and talk. Everything is conducted out in the open, it's about what you can do."
