In Spain, an outbreak of violence in Madrid in May 1936 between anarchist and antifascist groups had been put down. After the military coup d'état of July 1936, led by General Franco, the army demanded the abdication of the republicans in San Sebastián. They organised the Nationalist uprising and the Spanish Civil War began. The conflict lasted for three years and tore asunder the fabric of the nation. It was a cataclysmic event in Spanish history, which led to a violent and bloody four-year civil war that pitted the Republicans against the Nationalists. The remnants of the Republic were scattered around the country. Many Republican soldiers joined the International Brigades, a collection of volunteers from all over the world who fought on the anti-Franco side of the war, the so-called International Brigade. Faced with the threat of bankruptcy and the loss of Spain's most strategic port, Gibraltar, the Republic ceded control of the area in return for promises of financial aid from England. As in North America and elsewhere, the Revolutionary Government was fragile and divided, lacking the power to deal effectively with the Nationalist uprising and the new war. In March 1937, the Republican Navy mutinied, leaving the capital city of Madrid to the Nationalists. The overthrow of the civil government
