See id. at 415, 88 S.Ct. at 2184 (explaining that the bad faith claim "turns on the extent of the investigation conducted by the insurer before rejecting [the] claim"). The question, then, is whether a reasonable investigation would have revealed a basis for a potential claim for underinsured motorist benefits under named insured's policy. We conclude that it would not. It is undisputed that the named insured had no direct knowledge of the collision, and, in fact, heard no *728 report of the collision until over two years after the accident. It is also undisputed that the named insured did not have actual or constructive knowledge of the accident until over two years after the accident. The investigative report made by the Hartford agent is not to the contrary. It does not even mention that there was a second car involved in the accident. The agent's report consists of five handwritten pages, stating only that the insured's wife was driving and that she was intoxicated. No mention is made of a second car or whether the other driver may have been at fault. The agent did not consult with witnesses or record interviews. He did not try to determine what time the accident occurred. He had no information about what the
